Breakwater Battery, was a coastal defence battery at Port Kembla, New South Wales, Australia during World War II.

Constructed in 1939 to provide protection for Port Kembla from enemy shipping and submarines. Two 6 inch Mk XI gun emplacements with related underground facilities were constructed near the southern breakwater at Port Kembla.

The battery and observation post (now a military museum) were key structures of the command centre for Fortress Kembla during World War II.

Contents

1 Gallery

2 See also

3 References

4 External links

Gallery[edit]

See also[edit]

Military history of Australia portal

Military history of Australia

NSW Heritage Listing

External links[edit]

Breakwater Battery Military Museum - Museums and Galleries of New South Wales hide

vte

Barracks, batteries, bunkers and forts, Sydney and surrounds

City of Sydney

Dawes Point Battery Fleet Base East Fort Denison Fort Macquarie Fort Philip Hyde Park Barracks Victoria Barracks

Greater Western and South Western Sydney

Bankstown Bunker Camp Warwick Holsworthy Barracks Ingleburn Army Camp Wallgrove Army Base 118th General Hospital

La Perouse, Malabar and Clovelly

Bare Island Fort Banks Henry Head Battery Malabar Battery

Mosman and Manly

Beehive Casemate Bradleys Head Fortification Complex Georges Head Battery Lower Georges Heights Commanding Position Middle Head Fortifications Shelly Battery Sydney Harbour anti-submarine boom net

Watsons Bay, Vaucluse and North Bondi

Ben Buckler Gun Battery Anti-motor torpedo boat defensive battery Steel Point Battery Signal Hill Battery

City of Wollongong

Breakwater Battery Drummond Battery Flagstaff Hill Fort Illowra Battery (Hill 60) Smiths Hill Fort

See also

Coastal defences of Australia during World War II Sydney Harbour defences

Coordinates: 34°28′32.70″S 150°54′49.27″E